WRA to Continue Gate Control

The Rohwer Relocation Center will not close in less than six months and will not remain open more than a year, Project Director Ray Johnston said yesterday after he had received a general statement of policy from the War Relocation Authority.

Relocation of Japanese-Americans on the West Coast will be conducted in much the same manner that the evacuees have been relocated in other sections of the United States, and relocation in other sections of the U. S. will be continued, according to the WRA's general recommendations.

The policy toward the Japanese-Americans' privilege of coming to McGehee to shop will be substantially the same. No wholesale movement of the evacuees to and from Rohwer will be allowed and gate control will be exercised as in the the past, Johnston said.

In attempting to make the Japanese-American movement to the West coast an orderly process, the WRA will employ the same plans of relocation.
